However, there are benefits to having some cookies, and the internet can be a very different browsers will store cookies in different places. Google Chrome lets you clear cookies, site data, browsing history, cached images and more from inside the app (check out our guide on how to erase your Google history). Although these options are hidden in the privacy settings, you can access them in six simple steps. Other browsers, such as Mozilla Firefox, will often have a similar system to Chrome. However, in this app, it takes fewer steps. An HTTP cookie — often shortened to just "cookie" — is a small text file that a website has saved to your device, and it contains bits of information about what you did online. Leaving the page will automatically delete some of these cookies, but other cookies, but other cookies will stick around longer. The main purpose of a cookie is to make browsing the web easier, allowing your device to remember anything, such as your login details, any personal preferences or how to display a certain webpage. This speeds up loading times and lets you go between pages online without having to log in each time. One of the biggest downsides to cookies is that they can store basically any information. This means that when you see an ad online, it may have saved a cookie to your device, and if you buy that product later, the advertisers will know that it worked. They can also advertise products you've recently viewed to get you to buy them. However, even if these privacy issues don't concern you, it's still worth clearing your cookies. That's because some cookies will stick around permanently, and your browser can fill up with lots of these text files, sometimes for websites you don't even use. So, to keep your browser running quickly, you should occasionally clear any cookies on your device. Regardless of which browser you use on your mobile phone to surf the internet, you should be able to remove any cookies that these sites create. If you don't use Chrome or Firefox, be sure to search for options like "clear data," "clear browsing data" or "clear cache" in the "privacy" section. You can also stop sites from the start, by editing the privacy and security settings, although at the cost of a worse user experience. However, if you're dedicated to security above everything else, you should also check out some other secure browsers to help protect your device from additional threats.
